Project presentation was today, and it was a catastrophe. We had done verification of conflict finding and it was outputting appropriate colors. Our front-end was beautiful and we had finally managed to integrate the calendar API in a manner that allowed us to output classes on the days. Our final step was connecting the front-end to the back-end to accept inputted items and provide a link on the calendar page that allowed the user to click on it to view a list of students who had conflicts, highlighting the seniors of the group. This was supposed to be the easiest step, but it was not. Had we not waited until the night before to integrate them, we probably would have been okay. However, much to our chagrin, we were not that proactive. The integration went wrong of course, and we did not meet our deadline. We worked all night and will continue tomorrow. We removed the integration code to start from scratch and so far, things are functioning correctly. Hopefully, by the end of December 6th we will have our project fully functional and the client will be willing to view it a day late.
